Measuring Success by Outputs and Outcomes

Too often, transportation industry communicators attempt to measure the success of their outreach programs based only on outputs, such as number of news releases, interviews, ads or blog posts, without also measuring the outcomes of those efforts. In this session, you'll hear transportation industry panelists discuss how they are successfully using earned and paid media, video clips, guest articles, op-ed submissions and other means of awareness building to get noticed, create buzz and motivate audiences to act, which is the true measure of success.

Rising Above the Clamor — Leveraging the Media Spotlight

It's often difficult to get the ear of media and government officials... until there's a crisis or controversy. Then you may be thrust into the spotlight. Organizations must be prepared to seize the opportunity to communicate strategically when a crisis erupts, contributing critical information about an important issue, event, policy or program. This session will address case studies in effective strategic communications planning and implementation, to help you successfully relay your organization's messages to those you most want paying attention.

PR/GR Tag Teams – Ports, Corporations, Associations

In advocating for their various infrastructure programs, projects, policies and agendas, port authorities, corporations and associations depend on government relations professionals to raise awareness of their members' issues in the offices and chambers of their national government. These efforts are almost always supported by public relations. This session will explore the inter-relationships between GR and PR practitioners in three different organizations.
